To Whom It May Concern:

When I bought a 6000 square foot building 4 years ago in order to "gut it" and build it out into an outpatient addiction/family medicine facility, I chose a good construction firm and then I "lucked out" by getting Mark Bay as a supervising project manager. Needless to say, Mark and I spent countless hours together over the next 4 to 5 months. I found him to be beyond reproach in the areas of honesty, integrity, punctuality and fairness. When problems came up during the building process (usually sub contractors not fulfilling their obligations), Mark always negotiated a fair compromise. In the end Mark Bay treated my money like it was his money throughout the building process and produced an awesome building. After the building was done I left with a good relationship with Mark and have used Tri Bay construction several times since then. I don't hear that much anymore where folks get done building (residential or commercial) and they use their general contractor again (and refer him to friend and associates).
